Abstract:

People tend to implicitly assimilate each other. In this talk, I will present several studies of implicit behavioral/affective contagion. The first set of experiments concerns speed contagion, where people tend to modify their movement timing according to others' movements. In the second set of experiments, we examined how the presence of another person and the history of interaction with the person would influence body movements. The third experiment shows that covert manipulation of vocal emotion changes the speaker's emotional state. I will introduce and discuss other projects if we have extra time.
